Sell an AI playbook

You already know one job well enough to write it down. A stranger will pay to skip the guessing.

Who this is for

Someone who can explain a single result — a week of content, a client intake, a job application pack — better than a blank chat window.

First sale

A $19–$47 download bought by a person who is not you.

Time to first

7–21 days if you already know the job

Cash window

$19–$47 first offer

Tools

Google Docs or Word, Stripe Payment Link or Stan Store, one simple page, a second email to test-buy.

Leave this alone

A 200-page 'everything AI' book, fifteen products, or waiting for a course platform.

What this actually is

A playbook is not a memoir about AI. It is a job, written so a tired person can finish it without inventing the steps. The buyer is not shopping for inspiration. They are shopping for a sequence they can run this week.

The products that sell in this category are narrow. 'How to use ChatGPT' sits in a pile of free posts. 'A 10-day content system for a one-person landscaping company' is a product. The more specific the job, the less you compete with free generic advice.

You are allowed to use AI to draft. You are not allowed to ship the draft. The money is in the rewrite: your examples, your order of operations, your 'do this next' at the end of every chapter. If a chapter does not end with a next action, it is an essay. Cut it or finish it.

Who this is for — and who should skip it

This path fits if you have done a job more than three times and can name what went wrong the first time. That scar tissue is the product. People pay for the mistakes you already made.

Skip this path if you have never finished a result for anyone, including yourself. Write the playbook after you have a result, not as a way to avoid getting one. If you need cash this week, use a service path first, then turn the notes into this playbook.

The offer, named in one sentence

Write this sentence before you outline: 'I help [specific person] get [named result] in [time] using [named tools], even if [honest objection].' If you cannot fill the brackets, you do not have an offer yet.

Examples that work: a solo accountant who needs a month-end close checklist in Claude; a realtor who needs listing descriptions without sounding like a brochure; a tradesperson who wants five Google-ready posts a week without sitting on a phone for two hours.

Price the result, not the page count. First playbooks sell at $19–$47. Raise to $67–$97 when the file has templates, scripts, and a 14-day plan. Do not start at $297. You have no proof yet.

The first 72 hours

Hour 1–3: pick the buyer and the result. Write the one-sentence offer. If you have two ideas, pick the one you can finish without research you have not done.

Hour 4–8: outline 8–15 chapters. Each chapter title is a verb plus an object: 'Write the three hooks,' 'Set the checkout,' 'Send the ten messages.' Put a next action under each.

Day 2: draft ugly. Use AI for a first pass if you want, then rewrite every paragraph in the voice you would use to a friend at a kitchen table. Cut hype. Keep the steps.

Day 3: make the checkout. One product, one price, one file. Buy it yourself from a second email. If the download fails, nothing else matters. Then send ten messages to people who already know you. That is the whole 72 hours.

- One buyer, one result, one sentence
- 8–15 chapters that each end with a next action
- Ugly complete draft, then a human rewrite
- Working checkout, self-purchase, ten asks

The path, step by step

Step 1. Name the job on a sticky note. If it takes more than one line, it is two products. Split it.

Step 2. Collect the raw material you already have: old emails, checklists, prompts that worked, screenshots of a finished result. This is faster than inventing chapters from a blank page.

Step 3. Outline for a reader who is tired. First chapter: what 'done' looks like. Last chapter: what they do next week. Middle chapters are the work.

Step 4. Draft. Do not format yet. Do not design a cover. Words first.

Step 5. Rewrite for voice. Read a page out loud. If you would not say it, delete it.

Step 6. Add the working files: a template, a prompt block, a checklist. Buyers pay more when they can copy, not just read.

Step 7. Export a clean PDF. Number the chapters. Put your email on the last page for questions you actually want.

Step 8. Checkout. Stripe Payment Link or Stan. Title matches the one-sentence offer.

Step 9. Test-buy. Different browser, different email. Confirm the file arrives and opens.

Step 10. Ten personal messages. Not a broadcast. 'I wrote this for [job]. $19. If it is useful: [link]. If not, ignore.'

Step 11. After the first stranger sale, ask what they used. That sentence becomes your next ten posts.

Step 12. Only then add a second product or a $9 membership. Not before.

Copy you can actually send

DM: 'I put a short playbook live for [job]. One file, $19, instant download. If that is useful: [link]. If not, no need to reply.'

Post: 'Blank chat is expensive. I wrote the sequence I actually use for [result]. $19. Link in bio.'

Listing title: '[Job] in [time] — a playbook for [person], not another AI dump.'

Week-by-week if you have a job

Week 1: outline and ugly draft. No public launch.

Week 2: rewrite, templates, checkout, ten asks. First sale is allowed to be someone you know.

Week 3: three posts or emails that teach one chapter. Soft link.

Week 4: fix whatever the first buyers tripped on. Do not write book two.

Mistakes that kill this path

Writing for 'entrepreneurs.' That is not a buyer. Writing 80 pages of theory. Shipping a ChatGPT paste. Hiding the price. Launching with five bonuses and no core file. Waiting until it feels ready.

The playbook is ready when a stranger can finish chapter one without you in the room. That is the bar. Everything else is decoration.

Close the book. Do the first 72 hours. Do not tour the rest tonight.
